[2] [3] [1] Plot in Japanese-occupied Korea in 1925, Chun Man-duk, a revered hunter, lives with his teenage son, Seok, in a hut near Mount Jirisan. After a tragic accident in which he killed his beloved wife, he has retired from his rifle and become a humble herb collector among his cherished mountains. The Japanese governor-general overseeing the occupation gathers tiger skins as a hobby of appearing to be cultural dominance, and soon becomes obsessed with possibly killing the last remaining tiger in Korea, a giant one-eyed male that lives on the mountain and has killed scores of hunters. The tiger is known locally in hushed tones as mountain god, and locals fear its demise will bring wolves and pigs to return because of their absence. Gu-kyung is the tenacious but ruthless leader of a band of Korean hunters and his grandchildren that attempt to track and reward to kill the tiger, including killing his partner and two cubs and using them to bait. We learn that The mother of the fatally wounded tiger when she leapt at her near her kill of an escaped barn animal during a winter of privatization. He saved a nearby one-eyed cub and his brother by intervening against Gu-kyung, the more junior hunter who shot murder on his mother. He asked them to leave them on their fate. It is learnt that he secretly relocated them to the safe den, though the brother soon died. Seok loves a girl in the city, and secretly joins one of the Gu-kyung victims in the aspiration to earn a reward to convince her father to allow them to get married; During the hunt, Seok wound the tiger, but has himself mortally wounded. After several failures, rising predatory deaths, and facing profound winters, Japanese army soldiers are sent to participate in finding and increasing efforts to kill the tiger, and many attempts to enlist the man to facilitate the hunt duk, all of which he is strongly opposed to. However, after Seok's death and the injuries of the great beast, hunter and tiger, now away from both companions and offspring, each snow-destroyed mountain walk by fate toward the top, with bounty hunters and army in close pursuit. The human-duk reaches the top of the mountain and waits for the tiger. Soon after, the tiger appears. Man-duk and tiger then start fighting, with the former injuring the tiger. The man-duk provokes the tiger, asking why he stopped, and proceeds to carry out a knife on the side of the mountain. The tiger pounces on him and they both fall off the mountain together. The Governor General of the Japanese army asks Hunter what happened after the incident, and they relate to him that the mountain is a story about becoming the Lord's God. The governor-general comes to the conclusion that his army is unable to fight during the looming winter and has decided to withdraw by next spring. The film had sold $2.67 million in two weeks in South Korea. The film also won the 53rd Grand Bell Award for Best Engineering Award. The plot of Mount Jiri, the film's setting, is home to the same tigers in South Korea during the Japanese occupation of Korea in 1925, Chun Man-duk, a hunter revered by villagers for his talent and lifestyle, lives with his young son Seok, in a hut near Mount Jiri. In the past, after a tragic accident in which he accidentally killed his beloved wife, he retires from his hunting career and becomes a hunter sold to the collector pharmacy of herbs to make scant money, he is disabled in his feet and limp. He was offered to cooperate in tiger poaching by the Japanese but denied due to illness and hand tremors. He was the only one who knew the way to God's refuge of the jungle (behind his masrat house). Japan's military governors ended the occupation and rule of the empire and preferred to collect tiger skins as an expression of cultural ulaan (as tigers were the most revered animals in Korea), and soon became almost as much an obsession as hunting and killing most tigers in the wild and the tiger in the wild. In South Korea, a giant one-eyed male tiger lives on the mountain and has killed several Japanese hunters and soldiers. Locals also fear that when this hunt is swirling or captured, wild boar and wolves will multiply again and affect villagers. Japanese reports said a tiger in the mountains that Japanese scouts spied on the area was killed. From there, the governor ordered the tiger to be taken into custody. Gu-kyung is the tenacious but ruthless leader of a group of South Korean hunters who track down and try to destroy tigers for Japanese bonuses, he does so by trapping and killing his Homing friend and his two children to use them as bait to catch king tigers. He had an unsound spat with Lord Son when he was slapped in the face by tiger and escaped to death, but left long and deep scars on his face, he is also experienced in hunting tigers, the only talented behind the chosen man-duk. The film also claims that Chun Man-duk was sorry in killing the mother of this king tiger when he fell into a barn near the pig carcass escaping during a deprived winter, although he rescued near a blinding tiger (later it was the mountain) and his sister intervened against the tiger by killing the entire family of hunter Gu-kyung tigers and taking them to a safe cave and pheasant to survive. Intends to take the hide to provide, yet he regularly cares about it, after some time, the owner of the forest disappeared and the second tiger soon died because he could not survive. Seok, son of a girl in the city, but proposes no money, in shallow minutes, the boy hides his father secretly hides his father to earn enough bonus to persuade his parents to join one of the gu-led victims with their desire to allow them to get married. When the entire group of hunters in combination with the Japanese army knocked the alum down to hunt down, the king appeared to be the tiger, the hounds were afraid to flee. It appears on a large rocky muzzle and brings fear to the entire group. After a thunderous roar, it attacks the group and massacres, inflicts wounds of the Seok tiger, but is seriously injured and then eaten by wolves. Forest's son chased wolves and returned the bodies to the grieving hunter. After several setbacks, and dead hunters, soldiers and long-standing winters, the governor's total force directed to destroy this tiger, japanese army soldiers were sent to find and participate in efforts to destroy the tiger, and several attempts were made to enlist the man-duk to facilitate the hunt. , all refused strictly. However, after Seok's death and the wounds of the great beast, the predator and the tiger, now both lost their companions Kids, and luck toward the top of snow-blowing mountains, with bonus hunters and soldiers in search near targets. Man-Duk decides to climb the top of the mountain and wait for the tiger. Soon the tiger appeared. Man-duk and tiger then start fighting, with tiger wounds. Man-duk told Tiger, asking why he stopped tiger arrived at him and they both fell off the mountain together. The General Hunters of the Japanese army then ask what happened after the incident, and they only mysteriously disappear about it and talk about becoming God. The governor decided to vacate and the army will return next spring. The film ends with a reimagining of human-duk and a happier life than the head of the tiger herd and the body of the tiger and man-duk covered in snowfall.
